THERE is war, too, in the democratic camp, especially just now in Kentucky. WATTERSON'S contract to deliver that state to Tilden at Cincinnati is being sadly imperiled. BECK, BLACKBURN and KNOTT are opposing, to say nothing of BLANTON DUNCAN. If TILDEN is defeated at Cincinnati Watterson ought to turn in and help elect GRANT. It is darkly hinted that he will.

IS IT WISE?

GRANT men are true party men, but quent, and recently very fatal. after all they are human. Their opponents in the republican party do not seem to consider that threats to defeat the election of General GRANT, should be be nominated, GRANT. We are living in a secondary stage of politiest existence, in which all the great elements of government being ascertained and defined, there is nothing political on which great minds can work, and consequently great minds don't work on them. The American mind at present is working on wheat, and cutton, and mining stocks, and railroads. Political problems have in great measure lost their interest. Hence, instead of having great political leaders, men of large experience and broad national ideas, of large experience and broad national ideas we have the picayune politicians of New York and Pennsylvania, of Maine and Goorgia leading off factions and getting up tempests in a teapot. This is a state of things which has occurred before in our country and several times in England, and which, we suppose, is one of the natural conditions of political human nature. The production of real storms crosses sometimes, and so does the real storms crosses sometimes are sometimes. storms ceases sometimes, and so does the production of men to act in them. That is something a good doal more than his opponents have. If Grant is nominated that will be the sole cause of it. There is a want of somebody that stands out and above the second-rate politicians. I have not thought that Grant would be nominated, not because there would not be delegates enough, but because a serious consultation are successful. enough, but because a serious consultation among his friends would probably show that it was inexpedient, both for him and for them.

The publication of the article in the A. M. CLAPP. - - - - EDITOR.
